Tired of working on the screen when your eyes become tired and start to get blurry,... jrebel: A couple of weeks ago, I took the plunge and decided to upgrade to Windows Vista Ultimate. I needed to know if my Gateway laptop with 64-bit Windows XP could handle Vista properly and what kinds of issues I'd run into. To my surprise, I've been playing around with Vista for over a month now and I can't say that I had many headaches. Everything worked just fine. No browser crashes, and my little printer has been running smoothly. I can say one thing, however: Microsoft's new OS is much slower than XP. Yes, it has more features, but if you're really that used to XP and don't like the changes, you'll be waiting a long time for Vista to work. Here are my six main problems I've run into so far: Vista's new boot-up screen is annoying and obnoxious. I don't care for the cartoon animals, and the usual "here's what's new" graphic is very distracting. You can turn off the bouncing dicks, but you still have to wait a full 5-10 seconds longer for your computer to boot. XP was cool and stealthy, Vista makes me feel like I'm having a heart attack during the boot-up process. Wifi is still way, way behind XP. The big picture is that Vista is still a beta version, and it's a beta released 3 years after XP. That's right: Vista came out 3 years after XP and it's still beta. Vista's networking support is not on par with XP. I say this from personal experience. I've been having a heck of a time trying to use a new feature called "Mobile Broadband" with a Netgear USB/BT dongle. In the end, my solution was to switch to the old-fashioned dialup modem. The worst part is, this is supposed to be a "game changer", a way for the average person to access the internet with a broadband connection. Turns out, Microsoft can't even make a single simple connection to work properly. My work is slow. This is an expected Vista problem. You can be sure that Windows Vista will take longer to load and perform certain tasks. Compared to XP, it's just slower. I'm getting used to the new Start Menu. Vista has this new start menu thing where the start menu is hidden
