Q: Where is the Hashidin Wa Hallal gotten from? In Shas Halacha (O.C. 249) it is quoted in the name of the Sage of Medina that the first person after whom the Mitzva of Gid HaShem HaMitzvot of Halal is named is the Hashidin, who is the son of Amram, and is the ancestor of Amram. (In his name the Mitzva of Gid HaShem is performed and the Mitzva of Avraham Avinu was committed.) Furthermore, both in the Talmud and the Midrash it is said that this is the reason why the Mitzva of Halal has the word HaMitzvot in its name, for the Mitzva of HaMitzvot was committed upon the Hashidin, who is the ancestor of Amram. There are many verses in the Talmud mentioning that the commandment of the Mitzva of Halal was given to Amram's father, the Hashidin. There are several places where it is even written that the Halal Mitzva was established when it was commanded to Amram's father. Where is the underlying source for this information? A: There is none. The statement about the Mitzva of Halal is

Is a "control" group needed?
In theory, there seems no good reason for performing an RCT in evaluating complex interventions. All measurable effects should be achievable by the usual means of clinical inquiry and patient self-reporting. If the investigators are unable to measure or quantify the patient's level of function, the interaction of the intervention with the patient's physiology, or the effect of social, cultural, or economic factors, then there is little justification for randomizing patients to such an unnatural intervention. Such "control" groups are not easy to implement or justify, but they do seem to be a necessary part of a justifiable trial. To a large extent, the cost of a trial is proportionate to the number of control and intervention groups that one chooses to randomize. We have suggested that a pragmatic RCT in areas such as rehabilitation is better served by those investigators whose experience and interests lie in that of the patient rather than in an RCT.

A random-effects model to estimate the association between the chlorophenols and dichlorophenol levels and diabetes mellitus. Exposure to chlorophenols and dichlorophenols is associated with diabetes mellitus (DM) development. However, a lot of the results in the literature are contradictory, and there is still no reliable evidence of a causal relationship. The objective of the study was to quantify the association between the levels of these pollutants and a diagnosis of DM. This is a case-control study. We recruited 170 participants from the Geriatric Ambulatory of the Hospital of São João. The levels of chlorophenols and dichlorophenols were measured in urine samples obtained in a 24-hour period, in the morning and in the afternoon, and evaluated according to the International Chemical Safety Expert Committee's guidelines. Participants with DM were compared to individuals with similar characteristics but without DM. Two log
